

Liberal Media Scores Another Win

By CS Bennett

As always, establishment-type Republicans, which is the political culture Trey Gowdy comes from, have been viewed by true conservatives, like myself, as being more concerned about the optics, not making their inquiry look like a witch hunt targeting Hillary and Obama that, than being concerned about telling Americans what really did happen and who was behind what happened. In the end, Trey Gowdy handed over control of the narrative. True, his emphasis was always about letting the facts lead him to the truth and then report the truth as was established by the facts, and that he, and his staff, did and honorably.

But the headlines should have read: 'Our Findings Show That Barack Hussein Obama & Hillary Are Guilty of Gross Negligence In Benghazi Massacre!' If Trey had used this terminology instead of just saying to the hungry and frenzied left-wing leaning reporters that I hope you will read the findings (which many of them will not do now), they would have had to report it the way he expressed it to them. The media's main concern all along was whether or not Hillary was off the hook? That's all. And once it looked and sounded that way, they had no further interest in the report.

Had the headlines been reported the way that was just suggested, the media would have been more prone to read the report to find out why and how the report came to its conclusion. What it all boils down to is that Washington bred republicans just do not know how to handle liberals and the liberal media. You cannot just say that I wasn't interested in the politics of this, just the facts, and think you can convincingly win over, or dazzle, the media with your findings. It is well known that in a court of law the lawyer who tells the most compelling story using the facts that he or she has available to them usually wins the case.

Liberals are good at telling stories but the foundation of their stories is usually based upon lies. Republicans have to learn how to counter these political hacks, and their shenanigans, by telling a more compelling story that is based on nothing but the truth.

So, the spin is on... nothing new from these reports to damage Hillary's run for the presidency.
